

KT: The holy month is round the corner. What are your plans for Ramadan?

Maryam: We don't have a dedicated plan for Ramadan. re:food is a consistent part of the food and beverage industry and not a temporary campaign, and we intend to continue this way. Our non-profit is operated completely by volunteers.

KT: Volunteers may not be available under certain circumstances. Have you experienced a similar problem?

Maryam: We only distribute once a week. In my opinion, that's manageable. But the number of volunteers is increasing, and we have a good retention rate. Unlike other non-profit organizations here in Kuwait, we don't experience a high turnover rate among volunteers. Whether for registration or packaging, our tasks are really simple. Plus, we don't pressure them to work at certain hours.

KT: The health of beneficiaries is important, and must take safety and the validity of the food products into account. What are your health standards of evaluation?

Maryam: Once we receive the products, we enter information into our POS system as stock in our inventory. Then a certified person examines their validity for consumption. We have transparency in our procedures. We make sure that all the data is available, from the moment the stock is received to its distribution.

KT: How many people are registered with re:food and how did you approach them?

Maryam: There have been over 700 individual beneficiaries. Initially, we asked a Kuwaiti woman who's known for her food charity to link us with them. She cooks and gives food to the needy in Kuwait. She has built many relationships with unfortunate families and people with low incomes.
