DANIEL CRAIG'S CHILDREN WILL NOT INHERIT HIS FORTUNE

The 53-year-old actor - who shares one daughter with wife Rachel Weisz and another, Ella, with his ex-wife Fiona Loudon - believes "inheritance is quite distasteful" and says he won't leave his millions to his kids. Speaking to Candis magazine, Daniel said: "Isn't there an old adage that if you die a rich person, you've failed? "I think Andrew Carnegie [an American industrialist] gave away what in today's money would be about 11 billion dollars, which shows how rich he was because I'll bet he kept some of it, too. "But I don't want to leave great sums to the next generation. I think inheritance is quite distasteful. "My philosophy is get rid of it or give it away before you go." Daniel is best known for playing the titular suave super spy in the James Bond franchise but admitted he is a big softie at heart. He said: "I don't want to play characters who don't feel. I'm as emotional as anyone and can cry at anything. "A good commercial can get me going if I'm in the mood." And the upcoming Bond movie 'No Time To Die' will be his last. Bond boss Barbara Broccoli said: "There's a few lines that are in the script that Bond fans will love from the books and some wonderful locations that are described in the books. "We consider this film to be a classic Bond film but with a modern twist. "It's also vitally important because it is the fifth and final one that Daniel Craig is going to be doing, so it's a culmination of everything his portrayal of the character has been through and it ties up all the storylines. It's a pretty epic film, I have to say.

Princess Beatrice: Dyslexia is a 'gift'

Princess Beatrice says dyslexia is a "gift" and her children would be lucky to have it. The 33-year-old royal - who is expecting her first child with her husband Edoardo Mapelli Mozzi - was diagnosed with dyslexia at the age of seven and has been patron of the Helen Arkell Dyslexia Charity since 2013. Speaking to HELLO! guest-editor Giovanna Fletcher for the publication's Back to School digital issue, she said: "Honestly, what inspired me to talk about dyslexia the way that I have, is because I really want to change the narrative around the diagnosis. Even referring to it as a diagnosis I feel does a disservice to the brilliance of some of the most fantastic minds that we have. And I think just shifting the narrative a little bit towards something that is positive, that is impactful, I think can really help everyone. "I was very lucky that when I was first told that I had dyslexia, not one person around me ever made me feel like it was a 'lesser than' scenario. It was always about moving forward, it was always about what you could do. Never about what you can't. And that's something that's really, really important to me. I find it very inspiring every day to talk about it. Because if you can just change one little idea in someone's head, then you've done a great thing." Beatrice revealed her husband Edoardo, 38 - who has a son Wolfie with his ex-girlfriend Dara Huang - is dyslexic and she thinks their kids would be "lucky" to also have it. Beatrice, who calls Wolfie her "bonus son", explained: "If any child, any bonus son, or future babies that are on their way, are lucky enough to be diagnosed with dyslexia, I feel incredibly grateful to have tools such as the Helen Arkell Dyslexia Charity to be able to tap into, to give them that extra support. I think it's really important for every parent, that they feel they are not alone in this. "My husband's also dyslexic so we'll see whether we're having this conversation in a couple of months' time with a new baby in the house, but I really see it as a gift. And I think life is about the moments, it's the challenges that make you. Of course, I would never want there to be any difficult situations. But I feel like if we're able to embrace some of the tools that we have from the Helen Arkell Dyslexia Charity and others, then I feel very, very lucky that we can have this conversation."

Sarah Ferguson hopes novel will be "the next 'Bridgerton'"

Sarah Ferguson wants her new novel to be "the next 'Bridgerton'". The 61-year-old writer recently released her Mills & Boon romance 'Her Heart For A Compass' and Sarah hopes it will be adapted for the screen like Julia Quinn's saucy 'Bridgerton' series. She told the 'Tea With Twigg' podcast: "I hope that it can be made into the next 'Bridgerton'. I need this book to be 'Pride And Prejudice' meets '24'." Sarah's historical fiction book is based on her great-great aunt Lady Margaret Montagu. She explained: "I invented a history for her that incorporated real people and events, including some of my other ancestors. I created a friendship between my heroine and Princess Louise, Queen Victoria's sixth child, and I drew on many parallels from my life for Lady Margaret's journey. I have long held a passion for historical research and telling the stories of strong women in history through film and television. I am proud to bring my personal brand of historical fiction to the publishing world." And it was previously revealed that Sarah had been holding talks about turning it into a TV series. A source told Variety: "Sarah's team] is already in talks with at least one streaming service and will be approaching others once a 360-degree treatment of the book is finished. These will include Amazon and Netflix. Everyone involved is looking at the success of 'Bridgerton' as a demonstration of the immense appeal of period drama on streaming services." Sarah said: "I'm really hopeful that 'Her Heart for a Compass' will come to life on screen: I see it as a TV series rather than a film. Things are at a very early stage but we're already in talks with some people about the potential to make it into a historical drama."

DOLLY PARTON: 'I GET MORE CREDIT THAN I DESERVE FOR COVID-19 VACCINE DONATION'

Dolly Parton says she has gotten more credit than she deserves for funding the Moderna vaccine. The 75-year-old singer/songwriter made a $1 million donation to COVID-19 vaccine research, which supported the development of the Moderna vaccine, but Dolly thinks she is getting too much credit. Speaking to Absolute Radio Country presenter Baylen Leonard, Dolly said: "When the pandemic came out, I just felt led to do something because I knew something bad was on the rise and I just kind of wanted to help with that, so I donated to help with that. So, mine was a small part of course, but I probably get a lot more credit than I deserve but I was happy to be part of that, and to be able to try stop something in its tracks that's really just become such a monster for all of us." Dolly also revealed she has no plans to perform on Broadway because she doesn't want to stay in one place for too long. She said: "I have been asked many times to perform on Broadway. I do love going to the shows but that is not something I have a desire to do. It's a sit-down job first of all, I'm more like a gypsy, I'm an entertainer I like going from one town to the next. But when you're on Broadway you've got to do the same thing over and over, which people who love Broadway love the stage, that's what they love to do, but my life was a little different to that." And the star - whose musical '9 to 5' is set to tour the UK from the end of this month - is keen to promote female empowerment. She said: "I think we should all be allowed to

Collins joins Cartier as face of Clash

[Un]limited Collection, Double C de Cartier Handbag

Cily Collins is the new face of Cartier's Clash [Un]limited collection and the Double C de Cartier handbag. The 'Emily in Paris' star - who is the daughter of musician Phil Collins - has admitted it feels like a full-circle moment landing the role at the French luxury fashion house, as her actress mother Jill Tavelman used to wear their men's watches and she always admired the timepieces. She said: "My mom always used to wear Cartier men's watches when I was growing up. "I remember loving the oversized look of it on her wrist, and then for my 18th birthday, she gifted me a watch, saying it would be with me my whole life. "I just have these familial memories associated with the house." The 32-year-old actress added to WWD: "It felt like part of this evolution of me growing up, it felt like an organic relationship that had been with me for so many years, but I never imagined that I would officially be a part of the family." The upcoming collection, which is an extension of the Clash de Cartier collection launched in 2019, includes fine jewelry with a twist, including spiked rings, bracelets, and earrings made of white gold, onyx, diamonds and amethyst, as well as two timepieces. Arnaud Carrez, Cartier's international marketing and communications director, hailed the 'Love, Rosie' star - who recently wrapped filming the second series of Netflix hit 'Emily in Paris' - for daring to be "different" with her style. He commented: "When it came to expressing the duality of the Clash [Un]limited jewelry, Lily Collins was the obvious choice. In summary, people who do not limit themselves." The capsule collection is set to drop next month.

be ourselves, whether its women in the workplace, if they're mistreated or if they do the work and don't get the credit for it. I think whoever does the job should be recognized and paid for that, shouldn't matter whether your male or female. So, I really understand and accept all the situations that I see going on in this world, in the music business or just in the world of business or out there in the workplace as well. So, I try in my own way to write songs about it, to talk about it in my way. "I'm so proud of the music business now that they're allowing people in that weren't allowed to be there before and they are treated with respect. We got a long way to go, just like the saying with 9 to 5 and the message in the movie as well as the musical. We have come far, but we have got far to go." Meanwhile, Dolly is keeping busy and is currently working on her first ever novel 'Run Rose Run', with writer James Patterson. She said: "I've been working on this book 'Run Rose Run' with the great James Patterson. This is my first novel and I've also written music, a whole CD to go along with it, based on the characters in the movie, their situations, attitudes and that sort of thing. It's the first time I know of that a book comes along with a CD." Listen to Absolute Radio on DAB or 1215AM, online, via the official mobile app digital TV or voice-activated device.
