allegations to emerge against him. This time, Bulgarian investigative journalist and Kremlin critic Christo Grozev said he has been "banned" from attending the awards, where a film about dissident Alexei Navalny won best documentary.

Grozev, who is credited with helping to reveal a plot to kill Navalny, appears in the documentary. He tweeted "wow" after the prize was announced. "He is such an important part of this film, so it's very sad for us that he is not here," producer Odessa Rae told reporters at the awards. London's Metropolitan police said only that "some journalists face the hostile intentions of foreign states whilst in the UK", while BAFTA said the safety of its guests and staff was a priority.

Blue ribbons

BAFTA also faced criticism for overlooking women. Only one, Gina Prince-Bythewood, was nominated for best director, for "The Woman King". That was one more than the Oscars managed in that category this year.

Berger, Farrell, Blanchett and Jamie Lee Curtis were among many attendees who wore blue ribbons on their suits and gowns in support of refugees. The gesture came after many more people were displaced by earthquakes in Turkey and Syria, and just ahead of the one-year anniversary of Russia's war in Ukraine. — AFP
